

PRESS RELEASE

We are pleased to announce that DR CHRIS FLAHERTY has recently become a Fellow of the Security Institute. In order to be granted membership, applicants have to either undergo a rigorous validation process which reviews relevant work experience, training and qualifications or complete a period of study and academic qualification in a security-related subject.

The Security Institute has approximately 1000 members, and is the largest association for security professionals in the UK.

The Security Institute promotes the highest-possible standards of probity and professional competence in the business of security, by working with the public and private sectors, and with other security-related associations, by agreeing core standards, by networking and by encouraging excellence in training.

DR. Chris Flaherty FSyl. is a commentator on security, defence and counter terrorism research, its application, and project management. He is currently a Senior Risk Consultant at Greymans Limited, where he advises on mass gatherings and crowded places' risk, vulnerability and security analysis. For Chris Flaherty, membership of the Security Institute is an important means for wider community outreach in terms of developing greater security awareness in the UK, and contributing to important debate, research and professional development in the UK today.

Chris Flaherty, see his membership of the Security Institute as an important adjunct to his ongoing role in security professional development, and his role in future Security R&D, in particular his recent appointment as a research team member with London Metropolitan Business School: Centre for International Business and Sustainability (CIBS).
